Microsoft Teams Application Development
Streamline work and collaboration

Microsoft Teams is a portal into your business

Microsoft Teams brings the Office 365 suite into a single, unified experience, including messaging, meetings, calendar, documents, sites, project management – everything. But adopting Teams on its own still leaves users flipping back and forth to the business applications they use every day. Fortunately, Teams is extensible, and add your line of business apps right into the collaboration experience.
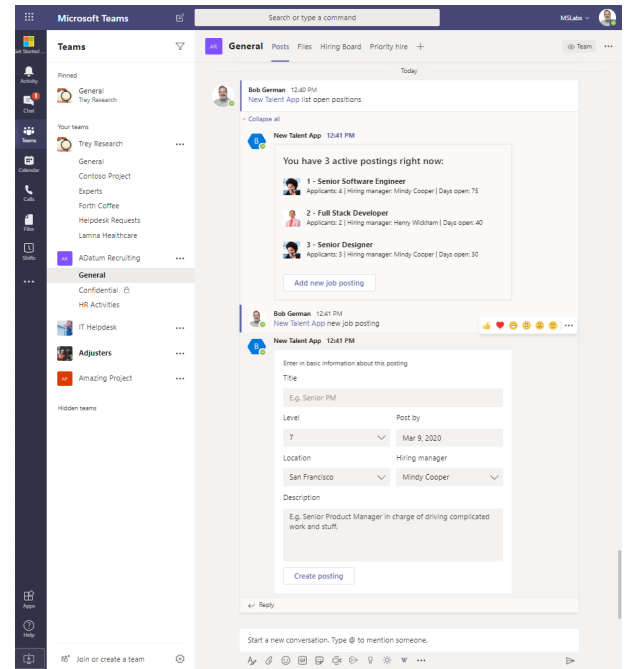

There are a number of advantages to this approach:

- Teams apps streamline work. Asking users to switch apps isn't the worst of it: they generally have to look up the information again in each app they open. Teams apps can run in the context of channels and bot conversations, allowing immediate access to the information needed.

- Teams apps bring teamwork to business applications. This promotes teamwork and information sharing and can reduce the amount of email needed to coordinate the use of business applications.

- Teams apps can lower cost and time to value. By building on Teams' collaboration and security features, and adding native support on mobile devices, Teams apps can be easier and less costly than starting from scratch

- Teams apps are discoverable. Apps can be pinned to the Teams sidebar using tenant-level policies, and Teams can be provisioned with app tabs and bots already in place. This makes apps obvious instead of requiring training and distributing links or installations to users.

What are the 20% of application features that users need 80% of the time? Where do you want to enable collaborative self-service while enforcing compliance and business rules? These are often the places a Teams app can provide the most benefit.
